I went deep into Google Books and other online sources, hoping to peer back in time. Google Books contains some titles in which either Google or a third party added "this page is intentionally blank" or the like to confirm that a scanning error didn't occur. Books dating back hundreds of years that describe old books or books for sale also include substantial references to blank sheets, in some cases helping a buyer or librarian ensure that a purchased book or one in a collection isn't incomplete.

SCOTCH ROMAN FACK

Scotia or to Print (Pica) Type, Lamps

A square inch, or words, is a word to spare inch.

First to see, first to print, and first to the heart of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and enduring sense of private life, public, dignified, and commanding, his example was an offering to all around him as even the effects of that example being. To his equals, he was understanding; to his inferiors, kind; and to the dead

A copy-thing guide from The College Annual, 1914

That only got me so far. I turned to experts in the history of the book and the history of business, many of whom were dumfounded about this particular piece of trivia. But Werner was a wellspring of knowledge. She'd found a 1541 manuscript, "Justin Martyr, Opera," in which on a blank sheet a different hand (Werner thinks a later reader) wrote "Nihil hic deest" on that page and the same or "Nihil deest" on the two succeeding empty pages — roughly translated, "Nothing is lacking."

Nihil hic deest

A scribe apparently counted badly, leaving blank pages.

Werner says she thinks "the original scribe left it blank because his copytext didn't have that bit, and maybe he was going to go back and fill it in, and so guessed the amount of space it would take and left that blank." Other empty pages weren't so noted, however. Scribes could work in concert, each working separately on a two-folded folded leaf. Werner explains.

When the quite was full, you'd move on to the next one. From a writing standpoint, it makes sense that it's easier to write on a small gathering of leaves than in an already-bound codex. From a production standpoint, it means that the volume does not need to be written in sequence; multiple sections could be copied simultaneously (more relevant, perhaps, for medieval mass manuscripts) that were copied in bulk.

But Werner also put me on to an even older reference through the agency of a lesser third seen just a couple days before my query came in. Joe Howley, an assistant professor of Latin literature at Columbia University, had posted a picture from a book printed in 1471 that he was examining at the University of Pennsylvania.

At the bottom of a page in Chronographia of Pomponius Mela, a work written 1400 years prior in Rome, appeared our friend, "Nihil hic deest," where there are a few lines of empty space. Below that phrase is the heading ("De Gallia") that ostensibly should have appeared at the head of the next page.

in orientem, ab oriente, dispersi populi immensus usque in thraciam : penetrare i.

nihil hic deest

DE GALLIA

The phrase marks the accidental early end of a page.

Books of this early-printing era, which is known as the incunabula ("in the cradle"), were still in flux, as printers figured out what features of manuscripts would be kept in printed works. Howley notes
